

Antofagasta | Migrants

Rosa Chamorro

| Colombia |

translated by Nicole Froio

Antofagasta the newcomers' camp

“we have to suffer a little, there’s no alternative”

The houses were built in a desert of cold night.
Their broken windows condemned in the howling wind struggling to barge in

The rest of the city, asleep, ignores this part of the outskirts Each morning they march loads of workers,
caked,
heading to the copper mines

And they leave behind dozens of gloomy chipboard houses clinging to hills like mussels to coral

The land is dry and they live in hope, each one with a small amount of memories and a number on their uniform pocket, always going through the same disgrace, men with new faces each time.

Migrants

The unforgotten footprint settles in the dust of tomorrow Manuel Zapata Olivella

And not only them. Not only the family, the parents, the kids, not only the hairdresser whose scissors arrive with another language and the cook who converts her taste into a room of memories.

Not only the woman who dances, drums at her feet, so that hours flow by scaring away shadows of sadness.

Not only the voices, the bustle in the market square without a passport given by the wind

Against the Pacific, hands not only fishermen pushing cast nets like blind birds while a row of dogs expect a trace of hunger.

And in a quiet corner a teacher opens a book where the imaginary inhabitants of a town that was born without heaven wait.

Not only that someone who caulks ships at the dock so that time starts walking in the sails of ships.

Not only women who,
tearing pieces of childhood, braid their hair spreading sun seeds.

They feel their way back with their words, what once was,
next to the river of the night that crosses their fear.

Poems dedicated to Colombian migrants in Chile

