

Rukweza farmer | Forest songs translated by Jackson Schmiedek

Rukweza farmer

vakuru vakati

pasi kare makunguo aidyei

bestowed the honour of wasting time precisely 1hr15 minutes i turn to the timely tone of timelessness return to the wilderness of imagination the rukweza farmer sits guarding the precious rukweza crop guarding against makunguo the winged intruders who disrupt to steal the precious rukweza crop and yet shumo the proverb asks

in the absence of the farmer's field what do makunguo eat

kurodza demo hakutambisi nguva

the rukweza farmer sits still the rukweza farmer sits in silence and yet shumo the proverb suggests

silence is not wasting time it is preparation for speaking stillness is not wasting time it is preparation for action the rukweza sways in the wind but is still confined to boundaries of the farmer's field
the rukweza is kissed by the sun but it was not the caress of the wind that brought it here
the rukweza does not grow wild
language does not grow wild it is restrained by tenses it is confined to boundaries
the manicured field of grammar and yet shumo the proverb remains
ancestors are not in the past present or future ancestors are boundless in the wilderness of imagination in storytelling
in mbira melodies rukweza is not tamed into a crop rukweza grows wild here here in

Forest songs

as travellers strive
from origin to destiny
who wings the forest

in familiar landscape
or don't know the way
who pings the forest

tired and hungry
worried and thirsty
who brings the forest

as different truths
fight over her name
who kings the forest

a medium connecting worlds to other worlds
who swings the forest

from ancient times
travellers have known
who sings the forest
